Department of Biblical Studies:

BI520

Hermeneutics (5 ECTS)

Tuesdays | 09:00 - 10:50 & Thursdays | 13.30 - 15.20

Dr. J.D. Atkins

Prerequisite courses required: Elementary & Intermediate Greek

This foundational course, which provides an introduction to exegetical methods and the principles of biblical hermeneutics, is a prerequisite for all other MDiv courses in exegesis and preaching. While substantial attention is given to hermeneutical theory, this is primarily a practical (“how-to”) course whose main purpose is to help the student grow in wisdom, skill, and joyful devotion in reading, interpreting, and applying the Bible. Principles and methods taught in the lectures and readings will be reinforced by skill development activities (e.g., exegetical labs, group discussions). Some lectures and assignments assume proficiency in Koinē Greek, but English Bible translations are often used as well. No knowledge of Biblical Hebrew or Aramaic is required.

NT705

Gospels (5 ECTS)

Fridays | 08:30 - 11:50

Dr. Adam Day

Prerequisite courses required: Elementary & Intermediate Greek

This course presents a recommended exegetical approach to NT narrative literature through the consideration of the origins, structure, and theology of the four Gospels. Topics include the literary character of the Gospels, differences and similarities between the Gospels, the Synoptic problem, the Gospel writers’ use of the OT, and appropriate application of NT narrative literature. Students will learn about and employ a variety of exegetical skills including grammatical analysis, textual criticism, form criticism, redaction criticism, and narrative criticism.

OT740

Hebrew Prose (5 ECTS)

Tuesdays | 13:30 - 15:20 & Thursdays | 09.00 - 10.50

Dr. Derek Bass

Prerequisite courses required: Elementary & Intermediate Hebrew

The goal of the Hebrew prose course is to equip students with the skills and knowledge necessary to interpret and exegete Hebrew narrative texts from the Old Testament for the sake of Christian ministry. An emphasis will be laid on enabling students to read and expound such narratives themselves in the Hebrew text without the need for constant recourse to secondary exegetical literature. To this end, the course will teach certain methodological skills applied to a defined corpus of texts, for instance, the Book of Exodus or the Book of Kings. These can include but may not be confined to close readings of the text, structural and discourse analyses of the text, narratological analyses of the text, semantic analyses of particular words or phrases in the text, and pragmatic analyses of the text. As a result, students will be enabled to approach the biblical-theological, systematic-theological, and practical-theological relevance of a given narrative passage in the Old Testament more effectively.

OT840

Old Testament Theology (5 ECTS)

Wednesdays | 13:30 - 16:20

Dr. Derek Bass

Prerequisite courses required: Hebrew Prose

Through a literary-theological approach to Old Testament Biblical Theology and close readings of key Hebrew texts with a view to their inner-canonical development (i.e., hermeneutics), students will attempt to understand the OT Scriptures on their own terms and embrace the interpretive perspective of the biblical authors.

Anthropology (5 ECTS)

Thursdays | 13.30 - 16.20

Dr. Szazsi Bene

This course delves into the Christian understanding of human nature through the lens of theological anthropology. Students will explore key concepts, debates, and perspectives on the nature of humanity, drawing insights from the Scriptures, the textbook (The human being, a theological anthropology, Eerdmans 2013). The course emphasizes critical thinking, engagement with primary texts, and encourages students to apply theological concepts to contemporary issues.

HT510

Early Church History (5 ECTS)

Tuesdays | 13:30 - 16:20

Dr. T. J. Marinello

The class exposes the student to a basic knowledge of the development of the Christian Church's theology and practices from Pentecost to 1517 as the Church interacted with culture and the state as well as underwent internal changes. This exposure is accomplished via readings and class lectures. Knowledge and understanding of the course material will be assessed via two examinations using objective questioning methods. Critical thinking skills and basic research methods will be demonstrated through the composition of a series of short essays. These essays will be returned with comments, questions, and other forms of reaction in addition to the overall grade.
